The earliest Scottish burial sites date back to prehistoric times, with evidence of megalithic monuments and cairns marking the graves of ancient peoples. As Christianity spread through Scotland during the Early Medieval period, burial practices shifted towards more organized churchyard settings. Early Christian cemeteries often surrounded churches, reflecting the importance of faith in life and death.

During the medieval era, graveyards became formalized, with parish churches establishing dedicated burial grounds. These sites often reflected social hierarchies, with prominent figures buried within consecrated ground near the church, while common folk were laid to rest further afield. The Scottish Reformation in the 16th century brought significant changes to burial practices, emphasizing simplicity and rejecting elaborate Catholic rituals. This period saw the emergence of more modest gravestones, often inscribed with biblical verses and personal details.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, Victorian influence introduced elaborate funerary art, mausoleums, and landscaped cemetery designs, reflecting Victorian ideals of remembrance and natural beauty. The establishment of large municipal cemeteries, such as Glasgow Necropolis (1832), exemplifies this trend, blending aesthetics with function and accessibility.
